Lawrence Greenburg

Lawrence is “more or less” retired in that no longer employed by anyone, so can do things that he has always been interested in – mostly unpaid! This includes taking courses for fun, helping a friend with their new business and being a volunteer with a housing association.

He started out as a market researcher before returning to university to qualify as a town planner. Subsequently he was a civil servant but then worked in housing for the remainder of his career, culminating in him founding and running The Dispute Service

Since his retirement, Lawrence has been involved at one time or another in housing associations, charitable organisations, a credit union and a local authority standards committee.

Thank you!
